The Scary Of Sixty-First represents a cat's cradle of threads spun from a career that encompasses work as a percussionist, sound artist, and composer. The results are artful and cerebral whilst capable of delivering cruel, visceral jabs to the gut. It all plays impeccably well to a film loaded with jittery, galaxy-brained conspiracy theories ...

Parents need to know that Ghostbusters is an iconic '80s movie that mixes a ton of humor (some of it fairly racy) in with the plotline about catching scary ghosts (a few are skeletal and scary) and the possible end of the world. The scariest part is probably the large dogs with glowing eyes that attack and possess two characters, though the now-dated special effects may not faze older kids.

A lone Mandalorian and among the last of her kind, Alex ekes out a living in the Outer Rim as a bounty hunter. Kara is the mission... well, until she's not. She's a child who charms everyone she meets (even Alex), babbles constantly (do these things turn off?), and eats Alex out of ship and home (it's a real problem).

The Shadows is written by Alex North, author of the amazingly terrifying book The Whisper Man. That being said, I had high expectations for The Shadows. The novel has nothing to do with the The Whisper Man, and Alex North starts the novel with great potential. However, it lacked the creative, twist turning plot that I expected out of it.
